Elevations on maps are typically represented by shades of grey for high mountain ranges, while underwater topography is depicted using blues that vary from dark to light depending on depth. The 3D map uses the Plate Carree projection method, which transforms Earth's points onto a flat surface by dividing it into equally spaced squares. This allows for easier comparison and visualization. In contrast, other map projections like Mercator can distort size while preserving angles, making them better suited for small areas but less ideal for broader views.
